Mysterious Poker Game in Which Stranger Put It Onto the New Yorker.

(New York Press.)

"Thirty years ago," said an old-time sport as he sat with a small part of friends in one corner of Jack's restaurant little before dawn, watching with mild amusement as three waiters were hustling five belligerent customers outdoors-"thirty years ago little old New York was a blame sight different from what it is now, as is only natural. And yet, when you figure it down, it was the same sort of a place. We didn't have just what we do now, but we had what stood for them. We didn't have the leg shows at the Casino and the New Amsterdam, but we had Denman Thompson and his Female Bathers over on Greenwich avenue, and Robinson Hall just out of Union Square, and we'd only just got over "pretty waiter girl" saloon, where the performers wore Casino costumes, the difference being that they sat with the audience instead of dancing on the burg in plate glass palaces in those days, but we had green turtle at Sutherland's and read saddle rocks at Dorlon's-the original Dorlon's, I mean. We didn't have stink-buggies to go round town in, but we had red stage sleighs running up and down Broadway two or three months every winter. They weren't as fast, but they didn't kill so many. Come to think of it, that was a good deal more than thirty years ago, but you get what I mean. "There were no such places an Can-field's then, but don't you believe there was no chance for a sporty man to risk his money. The legislature had not then discovered that an act which is permissible in one place is a crime in another, so you could buy Paris mutuals on the races as openly as you could buy a hat, and for games of chance there were numerous well-ap-

'We didn't have lobster a la New-

the poolrooms, but readily accessible.
"The three that come to mind most prominently were No. 18 Broadway, over Jackson's 'mourning store;' Norton & Murray's, in Eighth street, and Petrie's, next door to the old Star, in Lispenard street. Norton? Yes, big Mike Norton of Norton's Point, Coney Island, and state senator at Albany, He kept a gambling house and made his money there. Why not? Didn't John Morrissey, a bigger gambler than Mike, go to congress from New York pointed parlors, not quite so public as all these places, but keno was the lead ing favorite at the Eighth street place, faro at No. 18 and short-card games at Petrie's. I don't think poker was played as much in the east as it was in the west at that time, but there was always a poker game to be had at Petrie's if you wanted if. He played a stiff game himself when he sat in, but his favorite game was cribbage. "They tell a good story about the way he did up Ben Wood at cribbage one night. Wood was one of the best card players that ever lived. It was said that nobody could beat him at casino, for the reason that he knew every card that was out in the last hand-actually kept cases on the whole fifty-two, as they were played. He was fond of cribbage, too, and was a fair match for Petrie, though Petrie me one card.' won a large sum from him the night I spoke of by a trick so simple that it seems absurd. Perhaps it was the simplicity of it that enabled him to work without detection. All he did was to sneak a couple of deuces and a couple of treys out of the deck and get them out of the way.

"Any cribbage player will realize in moment the advantage that gave him over an antagonist who did not suspect that the deck was foul. Wood discarded without knowing and, of course at a great disadvantage. Anyhow, beat him, and, like a fool, told long afterward how he had done it.

There are times, as I said, when there would be a stiff game of poker at Petrie's, and some pretty well known people would sit in. You remember Steven French, at one time police commissioner, don't you? And you remember, perhaps, what Harry Hill, the old-time sport, said about him on the witness stand when he was having his big fight with the police force. Harry tired sending the profits of his business around to Mulberry street, and when he quit doing that they put him out of business altogether.

"Well, when he was testifying they asked him something about French, and Harry said: 'He's the best shortcard player I ever knew.'

"French was in the game, and so was Shed Shook, who ranked very high as a poker player also, though he usually played at the Morton House, where his headquarters was. Then there was Ben Wood, who played poker, as he played almost any known game, though it was not his favorite. Petrle himself took a hand, and there was a man who was new to New York, though he was as well known as any sport in the city before the winter was over.

"He called himself Brady, if I remember right, and said he came from Cincinnati, but whether he did, or if that was his name, I don't think anybody knew. What they did know was that he qualified as a billiard sharp at the expense of several suckers in Chris O'Connor's billiard room the day he made his appearance here, and after that went up against every game he could find that had any money in it. And whether it was luck or skill or both together that accounted for it. he was a large winner every time he played, till he left New York after a couple of months with a wad that made the New York gamblers gnash their teeth to think about

"I can't pretend to give the particulars of that game of poker, for I warn't there, but Petrie told me about it afterward, and I reckon the story is true. If it is, the game certainly must have been an interesting one.

They began with a dollar ante, and, as the custom was in those days, there was no talk of limit. A man could stay for his whole pile if he declared himself all in, but excepting for that he was always liable to be raised out unless he was prepared to back his hand to any extent. And if he lost his pile he was out of the game. He couldn't produce more money and go on play-

"It sounds a little flerce to the player who is accustomed to a limit or to the table stakes proposition, but I am not sure that it was so much more dangerous than the modern way of It certainly made a man more careful about going in, and made him study the game and study his opnents more closely. It undoubtedly led to bluffing, but at the same time it made the penalty so much greater when the bluff was called that it discouraged reckless play rather than encouraged it. Anyhow, that's the way they played.

"If Brady played crooked he certainly was not caught at it, and prob-ably no four men in New York were better qualified to detect him in case he had tried any funny business. Yet the way he held cards was enough to rouse anybody's suspicion. It was not that he held them all the time, for he didn't. He didn't even hold them every time he came in, for he lost when the pot was small as often as anybody else in the party, and won no more frequently than anybody else.

"But the really wonderful part of the play was that whenever anybody raised and Brady reraised he took the pot. He might come in, and he might even stand a modest raise on a moderately good hand and be outdrawn, but every time that he went back at his antagonist, even if he hadn't the best hand before the draw, he would come out with the best. And his luck (if it was luck) in the draw held good whether he was dealing or some other player

"Three times he filled either a flush or a full house in this fashion when he had bet heavily against a good hand, holding only a four-flush or two pairs, and he was something like $1,000 ahead of the game when Shed Shook, who had been watching him carefully, as he had all the others, suddenly opened

"It was his deal and Petrie anted They had warmed up by this time, so that the ante was $5. French came in and Wood trailed. Then Brady, after a little hesitation, put up his ten, bringing it back to Shook, who skinned his hand down carefully and put up $40, making a raise of $30.

Petrie found nothing worth the money and he dropped, but French stayed, and Wood, who hated to lay down at any time, also put up his $30, so there was a good pot to play for. "Brady said, very quietly: 'A hundred more,' and put up the money, so Shook looked at his hand again, as if he was afraid some of it had got away. What he saw seemed to reassure him, for without a word he laid a five-hundred-dollar bill in the pot.

ly, and Brady looked thoughtful, but after a while he fished out his wallet and put a thousand-dollar bill alongside the other one.
"It was the big play of the game, and although the others were out of it, they watched eagerly, almost as much interested as the two contestants. "Shook looked pleased, and said: T thought I'd catch you bluffing, sooner or later. It'll cost you quite a little more if you want to play that hand.' And he put up $5,000 more. "Brady said nothing, but he carefully counted the chips he had left. Then he emptied his wallet and went through his pockets, finding some small bills. Altogether he found $3,800, and this he pushed forward, saying: 'That's my "Shook took out his change, and then turned his hand over, showing four 'How many cards do you want? he said mockingly. Better take enough. You only got one draw, you know.'

"Brady turned his own cards over as calmly as if he had the winning hand, but he had only three queens. "'I thought so,' said Shook. 'Now, I suppose you think you'll get the oth-know, I cut the cards. Anyhow, give in his own gloomy reflections, he was engines, bollers, air compressors, 300 tons, me one card.'

ishment. "'That's what I said,' replied Brady, and Shook gave him one. It was the other queen

"That broke up the game. There was nobody there that wanted to play against Brady any more. He left town soon after, and I never heard of anybody running up against him in Cincinnati since then."

STRANGE WORKINGS OF FATE. (New York Press.)

An incident, which may interest the telepathist or the student of psychology, occurred a few days ago. A young man came to New York from a far western town knowing no one in the city except a young woman, a native of the same place, who had come to New York some time previously to make her home with felatives. She had sent him her address, but when he called at the house he found, to his dismay, that the family had moved. No one could tell him the new place of residence. The young man was heartbroken. He had been happy in the anticipation of meeting his old-time friend, but now there was little prospect of his ever being able to find her in the great metropolis. Utterly alone in a strange city a feeling of profound depression came over him.

After a few moments of deliberation he boarded a car to return to his hotel, and had gone but a short distance when a young woman entered the car

"'Well, I might,' said Brady. 'You and took a seat by his side. Absorbed scarcely conscious of her presence until she opened a letter and t read, holding the paper almost directly in his line of vision. There was noth ing in that circumstance to attract special attention, however, and in all probability the act would have made no impression on his mind had it not been for a slight commotion on the street which caused him to look up just at that moment. As he did so his eye caught the signature on the letter. It was the name and address of the very person he had traveled so many miles to meet.
